THE FOUNDER'S THRESHOLD

What Your Score Reveals

Six Growth Dimensions Every Scaling Founder Faces

The patterns that built your business may now constrain it.

uplift
GROWTH STRATEGIES

© 2025 Uplift Growth Strategies. All rights reserved.

CONTENTS

Read This First…… 3
Understanding what your score means

How to Understand This Guide…… 4
The structure behind each dimension

Dimension One — Revenue Leverage…….. 5
When every dollar requires your direct involvement

Dimension Two — Decision Rights……. 7
When every meaningful decision requires your approval

Dimension Three — Strategic Focus…….. 9
When every hour is spent IN the business, not ON it

Dimension Four — Systems & Scalability……..11
When critical knowledge lives in the founder's head

Dimension Five — Founder Resilience……..13
When the founder's capacity becomes the ceiling

Dimension Six — Ownership & Accountability……..15
When the founder is still reacting to the business

The Bigger Picture……18
How the six dimensions connect

What Comes Next……..18
Your invitation to go deeper

Let's Connect……..19
Explore more or schedule a call

 © 2025 Uplift Growth Strategies. All rights reserved.

INTRODUCTION

Read This First

You took the Threshold Signal because something about your growth feels stuck. Maybe revenue has plateaued despite hiring. Maybe every decision still flows through you. Maybe you're working harder than ever, but the business isn't moving any faster.

This guide goes deeper into the six dimensions that assessment measures. Not with frameworks or action plans, but with the patterns I see repeatedly in founders scaling from $2M to $10M.

What you'll find in these pages is honest. Some of it may feel familiar in ways that are worth sitting with. Awareness is useful, but recognition (the moment you see your own pattern clearly) is where things start to shift.

As you read, pay attention to two things. First, which dimension resonates most, the one that makes you pause and think, "That's exactly what's happening to me." Second, notice how the dimensions connect to each other. Most founders discover that what they thought were three or four separate problems is actually one pattern with multiple symptoms.

This guide will show you the landscape. What it won't do is tell you what to fix first. The right sequence depends on your specific situation, and getting the order wrong can cost more than getting the upside you're trying to create. That's a different conversation.

For now, let's look at what your score reveals.

 © 2025 Uplift Growth Strategies. All rights reserved.

GUIDE STRUCTURE

How to Understand This Guide

Each dimension follows the same structure:

The Pattern — What this dimension looks like when it's constraining growth. The experience of operating with this gap.

The Backstory — Where this constraint comes from. The instinct that served you before, and why it's now working against you.

The Trajectory — How this constraint typically evolves if left unaddressed, from invisible to undeniable.

The Shift — A brief look at what changes when founders address this dimension. The other side.

A Reflection Question — One question worth sitting with.

> Start with the dimension where you scored lowest. Then read the others; you may be surprised by what connects.

 © 2025 Uplift Growth Strategies. All rights reserved.

DIMENSION ONE

Revenue Leverage

When every dollar requires your direct involvement, the business can't grow beyond your calendar.

The Pattern

You're the person clients want in the room. You're the one who closes the deal, delivers the work, or manages the key relationships. Revenue flows, but it flows through you. Your team is busy, but the revenue engine remains fundamentally tied to your personal capacity. New opportunities come in, and you say yes, because saying no to revenue feels irresponsible.

If you stepped away for 30 days, you could probably name exactly which revenue would be at risk. Most founders at this stage can.

The Backstory

In the early days of a company's growth, there's a powerful and necessary instinct: any revenue is good revenue. You say yes to every client, every project, every opportunity, because survival rewards volume and hustle. And it works! That instinct is what got you to $2M.

But there's rarely a clear moment when that instinct stops being an advantage and starts becoming a constraint. By the time the company hits $2M–$3M, your calendar is full of revenue you personally generate and deliver, and not all of it is the right revenue. Some of it is low margin. Some are misaligned with the company's direction. But it's revenue, so turning it off feels dangerous.

The Trajectory

The Blind Spot

You're at capacity, but don't frame it that way. You frame it as "busy," which feels like success. The team is growing, but you're still the person clients want at the table. New opportunities arrive, and you say yes, because saying no to revenue feels wrong. There's no filter for which revenue actually builds the business versus which just fills the calendar.

The Signal

The real cost emerges, not in revenue, but in time. You have no space to work ON the business because every hour is consumed working IN it. Strategic thinking gets pushed to evenings, weekends, "when things slow down"—which never comes. You start feeling the weight, and it's natural to attribute it to the season, the market, or team dynamics, because those explanations are partly true. Meanwhile, the business is quietly becoming dependent on a delivery model that can't scale.

© 2025 Uplift Growth Strategies. All rights reserved.

The Crossroads

Burnout appears on the horizon, not as a dramatic crash, but as a slow erosion of energy, clarity, and decision quality. You're making more decisions, but not always good ones. Growth plateaus, and you face an uncomfortable realization: the revenue mix you built through years of saying yes is now the thing holding you back. But unwinding it feels risky, because what if the new revenue doesn't replace the old?

> The instinct that built the business may now be the instinct constraining it. And the hardest part isn't seeing the pattern; it's weighing the risk of changing a revenue model that's been working against the cost of keeping one that may have run its course.

The Shift

Founders who break this pattern don't just work less; they earn differently. They learn to distinguish between revenue that scales and revenue that consumes. They discover that saying no to the wrong clients creates space for the right ones. And they build delivery models in which quality doesn't depend on their personal presence at every engagement.

> REFLECTION QUESTION
>
> If you could only keep the revenue that doesn't require your direct involvement to deliver, what percentage of your current revenue would remain?

 © 2025 Uplift Growth Strategies. All rights reserved.

DIMENSION TWO

Decision Rights

When every meaningful decision requires your approval, you've delegated tasks but kept ownership.

The Pattern

Your door is always open. Your team checks in frequently, and you interpret this as healthy communication. But underneath the surface, a pattern has formed: making a decision without your input carries risk, while waiting for your approval carries none. So, the team waits. Your calendar fills with "quick questions" and "can I run something by you"—each one small, but collectively consuming hours every week.

You've hired capable people. You've given them titles and responsibilities. The question is whether you've also given them authority, and whether the distinction between those things is clear to anyone on the team. There's a difference between "handle onboarding" and "you own client retention." When ownership hasn't shifted, hiring more people doesn't necessarily change the dynamic; it can actually amplify it.

The Backstory

In the early days, you should make most of the decisions. You have the most context, the deepest customer understanding, and the highest stake. It works. But as the team grows, something insidious happens; you never formally transfer decision-making authority. The business has outgrown its decision architecture, yet it hasn't been redesigned.

Decision rights live within a polarity: control vs. empowerment. Think of it like breathing. If you could only inhale, only maintain control, the eventual outcome is pretty grim. If you could only exhale, only empower without structure, the result is equally unsustainable. But when done in balance, there's life and vitality.

Healthy control means your team knows the mission, the standards, and how you treat customers and each other. Clear expectations. That's the inhale. Empowerment means the authority to make appropriate decisions within those boundaries. That's the exhale. When founders sense the organization feels suffocated, it's often worth asking whether the breathing is in balance, or whether it's been all inhale for longer than they realized.

The Trajectory

The Blind Spot

You don't feel like a bottleneck; you feel needed. The team's frequent check-ins feel like engagement, not dependency. But underneath, the team has learned the unspoken rule: decisions made without you carry risk, decisions delayed until you weigh in carry none. Your calendar fills quietly with small approvals that add up to significant hours.

© 2025 Uplift Growth Strategies. All rights reserved.

The Signal

The speed of the business slows in ways that are hard to pinpoint. Projects take longer. Opportunities sit in limbo. Good people start showing signs of disengagement, not because they lack capability, but because they lack authority. You notice the team isn't stepping up and start questioning your hiring decisions. It's worth considering whether the issue is the people or the approval architecture around them that makes it difficult for capable people to demonstrate what they can do.

The Crossroads

Either you double down on involvement, hiring an assistant, working longer hours, and adding more check-ins, which treats the symptom while deepening the structural problem. Or talented people start leaving. They don't say "you're a bottleneck" in the exit interview. They say, "I'm looking for more ownership." You replace them and the cycle restarts, reinforcing the belief that it's hard to find good people.

> The founder experiences this as "my team can't operate without me." The team experiences it as "we're not allowed to." Both are telling the truth—and that gap is where growth stalls.

The Shift

Founders who find the breathing rhythm, the balance between control and empowerment, discover something unexpected. The team doesn't just execute faster. They make decisions the founder wouldn't have thought of, because they're closer to the work. The business becomes smarter, not just faster. And the founder's role shifts from approving decisions to designing the system that ensures good decisions happen without them.

> REFLECTION QUESTION
>
> How many decisions did your team make this week without checking with you first? And what does that number tell you about whether you've built a business that breathes?

 © 2025 Uplift Growth Strategies. All rights reserved.

DIMENSION THREE

Strategic Focus

When every hour is spent IN the business, nobody is working ON it—and the team navigates without a shared map.

The Pattern

You have a sense of where the company should go, but it lives in your head as a loose collection of ideas, not a written strategy driving daily decisions. When asked about your two-year vision, you can articulate something, but your calendar doesn't reflect it. Strategic thinking happens in the shower, on the commute, in the margins. It never gets the sustained, focused attention it requires.

Meanwhile, your team is navigating without a shared destination. Everyone has their own assumptions about where the company is heading. You think it's obvious. They think they're aligned. But nobody has tested that assumption, so eight people are rowing with slightly different destinations in mind.

The Backstory

Every founder knows they should spend more time "working on the business." It's the most repeated advice in entrepreneurship. But knowing it and doing it are separated by something more powerful than discipline; they're separated by identity. You built this company by being the best operator in the room. Solving problems, making calls, being in the mix. Strategic thinking feels abstract compared to the satisfaction of putting out a fire. So the urgent always wins over the important, not because of any lack of discipline, but because at an earlier stage, operating was leading. The challenge is recognizing when that equation has changed.

The Trajectory

The Blind Spot

The business is still moving forward, so the absence of strategic time doesn't feel urgent. You have ideas about the future, and you occasionally share them in meetings. But there's no structured process for turning those ideas into a shared direction. Your team makes decisions that feel slightly off, not wrong, but not aligned because there's no strategic framework guiding them.

The Signal

You get pulled into more decisions, not fewer, because without strategic clarity, everything feels like it needs your input. Hiring tends to respond to immediate pain rather than where the company needs to be in 18 months, which is understandable when there's no shared view of where that is. You start feeling like you're running faster, but the finish line isn't getting closer. The team, lacking a shared map, begins building its own informal assumptions about direction. And those assumptions are diverging.

© 2025 Uplift Growth Strategies. All rights reserved.

The Crossroads

The business enters a subtle drift. Revenue may still grow, but it grows in directions you didn't choose. The competitive landscape shifts, and the company is reacting, rather than positioning. You realize you've made a series of small, unchallenged decisions that compound into a direction you didn't intentionally set. The most painful version: you look up and realize the company that's emerged isn't quite the company you set out to build.

> The founder who doesn't create space for strategic work isn't just sacrificing their own clarity; they're sacrificing the team's clarity. They're forcing every person on their team to guess. And when people guess, the founder gets pulled back in to correct course, which reinforces the belief that "I have to be involved in everything."

The Shift

Founders who break this pattern don't just find time for strategy. They discover that aligning their team around a shared direction is what finally frees them from being the decision bottleneck. When everyone can see the destination, they can navigate without asking for directions. Growth stops being about the founder working harder and starts being about the team moving together.

REFLECTION QUESTION

If you asked every person on your team to write three sentences about where the company is heading in the next three years, how aligned would their answers be?

 © 2025 Uplift Growth Strategies. All rights reserved.

DIMENSION FOUR

Systems & Scalability

When critical knowledge lives in the founder's head, growth requires cloning the founder—which isn't a strategy.

The Pattern

Every client gets a custom approach. Every problem gets a creative solution. Every new hire learns by shadowing someone who learned by shadowing you. The business runs, but it runs on your presence and the institutional memory of a few key people. When someone asks how a critical process works, the honest answer is "It depends" or "Just ask me."

There's a version of this that's genuine flexibility. And there's a version where flexibility has quietly become fragility. The difference is worth examining.

The Backstory

You built the business by being adaptable. That adaptability was a genuine competitive advantage at $500K and continued to work at $1M. By $2M, it may be starting to crack, but quietly. There are no broken systems because there are no systems. There are habits, instincts, and tribal knowledge that live in your head and in the heads of the few people who've been around long enough to absorb it.

There's also a reasonable resistance at play. Many founders associate 'systems' with bureaucracy, surveillance, and micro-management because that's what most systems look like when they're designed from the top down. Systems are built to give managers visibility into behavior rather than to bring clarity and efficiency to the people doing the work. When someone says, "You need to build systems," the founder's instinct says, "That's not who I am as a leader." And they're right to resist that version of systems.

The alternative starts with a different question: How might we design systems that serve both the people using them and the business that depends on them? When a system is built to bring clarity and efficiency to the front line, helping people perform at their best, something remarkable happens. The team actually adopts it because it improves their work. The data becomes authentic because it reflects real activity rather than performed compliance. And the leadership visibility the business needs naturally emerges, not as surveillance but as a byproduct of a system that genuinely works for everyone.

© 2025 Uplift Growth Strategies. All rights reserved.

The Trajectory

The Blind Spot

The business runs on your presence and the institutional memory of a few key people. Onboarding is informal: “Shadow Sarah for a week, you’ll pick it up.” You handle exceptions personally because it’s faster than explaining the logic behind the decision. Every client engagement has a slightly different process. This feels like personalized service. It’s actually the absence of a repeatable framework.

The Signal

Inconsistency surfaces. Two team members handle the same situation differently, not because one is wrong, but because neither has a shared framework to reference. Quality becomes unpredictable. You get pulled back into operational details to “make sure it’s done right.” New hires take longer to become productive because everything requires context that isn’t written down anywhere.

The Crossroads

Growth becomes genuinely dangerous. Every new client, every new team member, every new initiative adds complexity without corresponding structure. The team builds their own informal workarounds—which means the business is slowly fragmenting into multiple unofficial ways of doing things. If a key person leaves, they take an entire body of knowledge with them. You face a painful choice: slow down growth to build infrastructure or keep growing on a foundation that gets shakier with every addition.

> Systems don’t replace the founder’s judgment. They encode it, so that judgment can operate through other people. And the best systems aren’t built to watch people. They’re built to serve them.

The Shift

Founders who systematize with the right intention, front-line value, not surveillance, discover that the team doesn’t just follow processes. They improve them. When systems are designed to help people do their best work, adoption becomes natural, quality becomes consistent, and the founder’s knowledge stops being a single point of failure. The custom touch that won the first 50 clients doesn’t disappear. It becomes teachable.

> REFLECTION QUESTION
>
> If you hired someone exceptional tomorrow, how long would it take for them to operate independently, and what would they need that doesn’t currently exist?

 © 2025 Uplift Growth Strategies. All rights reserved.

DIMENSION FIVE

Founder Resilience

When the founder's capacity becomes the ceiling, every other dimension hits a wall.

The Pattern

You're tired but functional. You've been tired before and pushed through, so this feels normal. Sleep is inconsistent. The peer relationships that once recharged you have been replaced by transactional networking. When someone asks, "How are you?" the answer is "Busy", delivered with a mix of pride and exhaustion.

You're not in crisis. But there may be a slow, quiet depletion that's become so familiar it feels like baseline.

The Backstory

Founders are known for endurance. The early years reward grinding; long hours, personal sacrifice, relentless forward motion. You develop an identity around being the one who can take it, who doesn't quit, who outworks the problem. That identity is earned, and it served a real purpose. The question is whether it's still serving you at this stage. Because resilience in the startup phase looks like pushing through. Resilience in the scaling phase looks like something completely different: knowing when to stop, who to lean on, and how to sustain energy across years, not sprints.

Two factors determine whether a founder can sustain leadership through the scaling phase: the quality of their team and the depth of trust in their advisory circle.

On the team side, resilience erodes fastest when you lack confidence in the people around you. Every task you can't fully trust someone else to own stays on your plate; not as a line item, but as a mental load. The solution isn't stress management. It's having people you'd bet on. That means disciplined talent selection: hiring for genuine capability, placing people in roles that fit their strengths, setting clear expectations, and recognizing results. When you look around and truly trust the talent at the table, a weight lifts that no amount of self-care can replicate.

On the advisory side, you have to make an emotional journey toward vulnerability-based trust, the willingness to be honest with mentors, advisors, and peers about what you're struggling with. Not performed confidence. Not "I've got this, just need to think it through." Genuine openness with people who care about your success. Most founders have never had that.

 © 2025 Uplift Growth Strategies. All rights reserved.

The Trajectory

The Blind Spot

The depletion is present but manageable. You've been tired before. Exercise has fallen off. The relationships that once recharged you have thinned. You're not in crisis—you're in a slow drain that you've normalized because you don't have a benchmark for what "sustainable" should feel like at this stage.

The Signal

The depletion starts affecting decision quality. Not dramatically, you're not making catastrophic errors. But you're making safe decisions. Avoiding conflict. Postponing hard conversations. Defaulting to what's familiar rather than what's needed. The creative energy that once drove innovation gets redirected to just keeping things running. You feel isolated, not because you lack people around you, but because you lack people who understand what you're carrying.

The Crossroads

Your capacity has become the ceiling for every other dimension. You don't have the energy for strategic thinking. You don't have the patience to develop people's decision-making ability. You don't have the bandwidth to build systems. You're running the business on fumes and muscle memory. The most dangerous symptom: you start questioning whether you even want this anymore, not because you've lost passion for the mission, but because the experience of running the business has become unsustainable.

> When founders feel depleted at this stage, the instinct is often "I need to be stronger" or "I need better balance." But it's worth considering whether the answer is actually relational.

The Shift

Founders who build the right human infrastructure—a team they trust with outcomes and advisors they trust with honesty—discover that resilience isn't something they have to manufacture. It becomes a byproduct of not carrying everything alone. The energy returns. The decision quality improves. And the founder rediscovers something they may have forgotten: this work can be sustaining, not just demanding.

> REFLECTION QUESTION
>
> Who in your life right now sees the real picture of what you're carrying, and whose counsel do you trust enough to actually change how you operate?

 © 2025 Uplift Growth Strategies. All rights reserved.

DIMENSION SIX

Ownership & Accountability

When the founder is still reacting to the business instead of designing it, every other improvement is built on a shifting foundation.

The Pattern

You solve problems as they arrive. You are good at it. In fact, you are so good at it that problem-solving has become your primary mode of operating. Your week is shaped by whatever needs your attention most urgently, and there is always something urgent. You move quickly, you make the call, and the business keeps running.

But there is a difference between running the business and directing it. Running it means responding to what shows up. Directing it means deciding what shows up in the first place. When you look at the past 90 days, most of your significant decisions were reactions to problems, not proactive choices about where the business is heading. That is not a criticism. It is a pattern worth noticing.

There is something else worth examining. When things go wrong, where does your mind go first? Toward the external factors (the market shifted, the client was unreasonable, the team dropped the ball) or toward the internal decisions that created the conditions for the problem? Both perspectives contain truth. But founders who consistently default to external explanations tend to remain in reactive mode longer because what needs to change always lies outside their control.

The Backstory

In the early days of building a company, reactivity is a survival skill. You have to respond to whatever the market throws at you, because you do not have the luxury of choosing your problems. Clients dictate your priorities. Cash flow dictates your decisions. The ability to pivot quickly, absorb setbacks, and keep moving forward is what separates the companies that survive from the ones that do not.

That mode of operating gets deeply encoded. It becomes your identity as a leader: the person who handles whatever comes their way. And it works for a long time. It works at $500K. It works at $1M. It may still appear to work at $2M and beyond, but something has quietly changed. The business is now large enough and complex enough that reacting to every situation individually is no longer sufficient. The volume of decisions has outgrown your capacity to make them all well.

The shift that is needed is not about working harder or being more disciplined. It is a shift in orientation: from solving the problems in front of you to designing the business so that fewer of those problems reach you in the first place. From operator to architect. That shift is not intuitive for founders because the operating identity that got them here is now the one that needs to evolve.

© 2025 Uplift Growth Strategies. All rights reserved.

The Trajectory

The Blind Spot

The business seems to be doing fine. Problems arise, and you handle them. You may even take pride in your responsiveness, your ability to make fast calls when the team hesitates. What you may not see is that the team has learned to bring problems to you rather than solving them, because your speed and judgment are so reliable that it is easier and safer to let you decide. The business has adapted to your reactivity. And that adaptation feels like things are working.

The Signal

You start to feel like you are running on a treadmill. The problems are not getting harder, but they are not getting fewer either. You solve the same categories of problems month after month. Team execution issues. Client escalations. Operational gaps that should have been addressed six months ago. You find yourself saying things like 'I should not have to deal with this' while simultaneously dealing with it. There is a growing gap between the leader you know you could be and the operator you spend most of your time being. The strategic questions that could reshape the business sit untouched because there is always something more immediate.

The Crossroads

You face a choice that may not present itself as a choice. You can continue to be the most capable problem-solver in the building, handling whatever comes up, making the calls, and keeping the machine running. This path is familiar and works until it does not! The other path requires something harder: stepping back far enough to see the system you have built, acknowledging that some of the patterns you are frustrated by are patterns you created, and taking responsibility for redesigning how the business operates rather than just operating it. That second path is uncomfortable because it means letting go of the identity that built the company in the first place.

> The founder who stays in reactive mode is not failing. They are succeeding at an earlier version of the job. The question is whether the business needs that version of leadership now or has quietly outgrown it.

The Shift

Founders who make this transition do not become less involved. They become differently involved. They stop asking 'What needs my attention today?' and start asking 'What can I design today so this category of problem stops reaching me?' They develop a written vision that is not a poster on the wall but a decision-making filter that the team can reference without asking for permission. They create accountability structures in which team members own outcomes, not just tasks, and in which the consequence of missing a commitment is a conversation, not a crisis.

The most surprising part of this shift is what it reveals about the team. Founders in reactive mode often underestimate their people, because the team has never had the structure or the authority to demonstrate what they are capable of. When accountability is clear and ownership is real, people who seemed like task-doers become leaders. Not always. But more often than founders expect.

© 2025 Uplift Growth Strategies. All rights reserved.

The founder who makes this shift does not lose their edge. They redirect it. The instinct that used to go toward solving every problem now goes toward building a business that solves its own problems. That is a different kind of satisfaction, and for most founders, it turns out to be a deeper one.

REFLECTION QUESTION

When was the last time you made a significant decision about how the company operates, not in response to a problem, but because you saw an opportunity to design something better? And if you cannot name one recently, what does that tell you about which mode you are spending most of your time in?

© 2025 Uplift Growth Strategies. All rights reserved.

AN INTERCONNECTION

The Bigger Picture

If you've read through all five dimensions, you've probably noticed something: they're not six separate problems. They're one interconnected system.

Revenue that's tethered to the founder leaves no time for strategic thinking. Without strategic clarity, the team can't make decisions independently. Without decision rights, the founder stays in the operational weeds. Without systems, knowledge can't transfer. Without the right people and advisors, the founder's energy erodes until none of the other shifts feel possible. And without ownership of the business as a system (not just a series of problems to solve) none of these shifts take root because the founder keeps rebuilding what they just fixed.

This interconnection is both a challenge and an opportunity. It means you can't fix everything at once, but it also means that fixing the right thing first creates a cascade. One structural shift can unlock movement across multiple dimensions.

The question isn't whether you can see these patterns. Most founders can, once they're named. The question is what to fix first, and in what order. Because the sequence matters as much as the action. When the sequence is right, one shift can create momentum across multiple dimensions. When it's not, you can invest real energy and still feel stuck, not because of a lack of effort, but because of the order.

NEXT STEPS

What Comes Next

This guide was designed to help you see the landscape more clearly—the patterns, the trajectories, the connections between dimensions. That clarity has value on its own.

If you're ready to go further, to identify your primary constraint(s), understand its root cause, and build a prioritized 90-day roadmap, that's exactly what The Founder's Threshold Diagnostic is built to do.

It's a structured working session, focused entirely on your specific situation. You walk away with a scored assessment across all six CEO-readiness dimensions, your top constraints mapped to root causes, and a sequenced action plan that you can implement in the next 90 days.

> Think of it as getting an MRI before treatment. Clear diagnosis. Clear priorities. Clear next steps!

 © 2025 Uplift Growth Strategies. All rights reserved.

Let’s Connect

The fact that you’ve read this far says something about how seriously you’re thinking about the next phase. That matters.

If you’d like to explore whether the Founder’s Threshold Diagnostic is the right fit, I’d welcome a 30-minute conversation. No pressure, no pitch! Just a chance to talk about where you are, what’s feeling stuck, and whether this approach makes sense for your situation.

Bob Baranski

Founder & CEO, Uplift Growth Strategies
206.619.3905

Book a 30-Minute Intro Call calendly.com/bob-baranski-upliftgrowthstrategies/30min

upliftgrowthstrategies.com

© 2025 Uplift Growth Strategies. All rights reserved.